Although the client has a history of verbal aggression, defiance, making threatening remarks and becoming physically aggressive by punching a wall, lesser-restrictive intervention techniques should have been applied (i.e., use of appropriate language, tone and deportment) while proving the client with appropriate de-escalating strategies to assist him in calming down and becoming more compliant." -"Action: Staff members involved were counseled on July 18, by [Mr. Little], [Mr. High] and [Mr. Campbell] on what a therapeutic relationship should look like and the importance of being professional at all times while respecting clients' boundaries. The importance of using time and space in order to give clients the opportunity to calm down when frustrated or upset was also discussed. [Staff #1] was reminded how going back and forth with a client or making antagonistic remarks could damage her therapeutic relationship and often triggers anger episodes with residents.
